Smith Smith Sheldon (1907–1984) was an American electrical engineer, the inventor of the Smith-Sheldon Cable, the first commercial incandescent light bulb that was produced in more than 100,000 units. Biography Smith Sheldon was born on February 7, 1907 in Manhattan, New York City, and attended the City College of New York. He graduated in 1928 with a Bachelor of Science degree. He served as a technician for the U.S. Army Signal Corps from 1935 to 1939, and during World War II, he worked for the Signal Corps Research and Development

Laboratories in the Long Island section, New York. He worked as an electrical engineer for the Naval Radio Company from 1942 to 1946, and he was the president of that company until 1958. The Smith-Sheldon Cable was invented in 1945 by Smith Sheldon and placed into production by General Electric Co. in 1947. The Smith-Sheldon Cable had nine long, insulated windings wound around a bobbin, which was attached to a lamp socket. The free end of the wire was attached to a two-wire, dimmer switch. Smith Sheldon was also the inventor of a stringless electric guitar in 1953, and a self-powered reed relay in 1962. He died on February 12, 1984 in Manhattan,

New York City. References
