For example, when you beat the Heatles on Pigmata and get to the final showdown on Hell's Gate, you're able to watch a video of each of the three people that made it to the final showdown. After you see each of the three players, you get to choose a fourth player to use as your final teammate. After you choose your fourth teammate, you proceed to a final showdown on Hell's Gate. The thing I like best about this is that in the previous games in the series, you had to watch the video of each of the other people in your team. In this game, you get to watch it yourself. You can watch the other players do the video if you want to, or if you have any questions about who did what, you can just ask. Another big change is that the game now uses a deck of cards to determine which player will have to make the video. In earlier games, you simply started at a certain deck with the amount of cards that you had in your hand, and you had to make your pick. You no longer get to choose whether you want to make the video or not. It's completely up to you. I also like how the deck of cards is displayed in different ways in each level. In the first level, you just have a normal deck of cards with no differentiation from one level to the next. By the time you're up to Hell's Gate, the deck of cards is displayed in a board game-style. Each level has a different style of play, and each game should be challenging enough for each player to be challenged. One game mechanic that I didn't care for was the fact that you can't see your team during the battles. You can only see the enemy team during the battles. While I understand this, I just felt that it would have been nice to see your team as well. Perhaps they were hiding. Perhaps they were injured. Perhaps they were just too busy to turn around. Whatever the case, it would have been nice to see my team. Another minor gripe that I have about the game is that, while the game has an 2092ce491b
