Girga The Girga (Georgian: გოგა) is a breed of domestic sheep from Georgia. It is particularly hardy; it is readily adapted to the hot climatic conditions of the region and is capable of surviving in the semi-desert climate of the Caucasus Mountains. History The Girga sheep are the first breed from Georgia to be recognised. They were originally native to the mountains of the south-east of Georgia. The origin of the breed is uncertain, but there is evidence from the Urartian kingdom of Van, during the 5th-4th century BC, that a variety of sheep of similar characteristics were kept. The animals were probably of a desert type, with their wool being used for clothing. The Girga were brought to the Armenian-Azerbaijani border region in the 18th century, and were kept primarily for meat. They are now distributed throughout Georgia, Armenia, Russia, Azerbaijan, Turkey, and Iran. In Armenia, where the Girga are not particularly valued as a meat breed, they are mainly used for dairy production. Characteristics The Girga wool is normally 4-6 mm thick and is of a strong, coarse, springy nature. It is normally spun in a 2-ply, which makes it dense, even, and long-stapled. This has made it popular for production of shawls and carpets. The sheep itself is semi-domesticated, being raised on pastureland. It has a wide range of characters, and varies in colour and in hair length. Among the white-faced sheep, which are the most common colour, dark, light, and rufous are the most common. The hair is mostly 30-52 mm long, but can be up to 3 cm long. Average weight is 16 kg.
