A new study released by the United Nations has called for the world to bring online systems like blockchains under the umbrella of international law, in order to deal with challenges facing the broader Internet ecosystem. The report, titled “Blockchain for Global Civil Society: Legal Frameworks for Regulating Disruptive Innovation in the Digital Era,” was released by the U.N.’s International Telecommunication Union (ITU) this week. The report, developed with the help of its International Telecommunication (IT) Policy Advisory Group, features three areas of focus. First, it looks at the impact of the growing shift from the World Wide Web to the Internet of Things (IoT), and the role of the blockchain as a transformative technology for many industry sectors. As the researchers note, “in the next decades, a range of technical, financial, legal, regulatory, institutional, and societal changes will be required, including the significant growth of the Internet of Things (IoT) and its associated ecosystems, the rise of disruptive technologies like blockchain, the emergence of new data platforms, and changes in consumer behavior.” “It is essential that these changes are embraced, rather than ignored,” they continue. “There is a need for technology to evolve in line with society and 2d92ce491b
