It has long been known that many earth formations, such as hydrocarbon bearing strata, are particularly susceptible to the presence of geophysical fields, such as geomagnetic fields. When the magnetic permeability or susceptibility of the earth formation is less than that of the surrounding earth formation, the earth formation will be less strongly affected by these fields than the surrounding earth formation and the earth formation will not, in general, exhibit these fields. Accordingly, the presence of geophysical fields in an earth formation is an indication that the earth formation may contain hydrocarbon and other valuable fluids. In order to determine the presence of geophysical fields in earth formations, it is well known in the art to use a flux-gate magnetometer in a borehole to detect the magnetic field and to measure the temporal variation of the field to determine the presence of such fields. Flux-gate magnetometers are employed to measure the magnetic field in the earth formations surrounding the borehole by measuring the voltage produced across a flux-gate transducer which, upon excitation, magnetizes the transducer at a predetermined rate, then demagnetizes the transducer, and, finally, becomes magnetized again. The transducer produces a pulse at the end of each magnetization cycle. The voltage across the transducer is proportional to the rate at which the transducer is magnetized and therefore is directly proportional to the magnetic field at the point where the transducer is located.

By making measurements at a plurality of points in the earth formation in a circumferentially spaced, vertically spaced-apart relationship, it is possible to measure the magnetic field at a plurality of points in the earth formation and to determine whether a significant level of a geophysical field is present. When using a magnetometer of
