Kentucky man was convicted this week of a series of bomb threats to churches, schools and a hospital in three states — just the latest installment in a string of similar cases that have happened in the past two months. Anthony Pulos, 45, was sentenced in May to seven years in federal prison for his role in threats and acts of vandalism at churches in Kentucky and Ohio, threatening to blow up an Oklahoma nuclear power plant and ordering attacks at hospitals and schools in Oregon and Texas. Pulos, of Indiana, pleaded guilty in April to the Oregon case, in which he made 14 bomb threats to Multnomah County, Ore., hospitals between Sept. 13 and Oct. 19, including one to the Portland VA Medical Center, the Portland Police Department, Multnomah County Children's Hospital and Portland Public Schools. But his case was the one that attracted national attention. Prosecutors told U.S. District Judge Marco A. Castillo that Pulos planned the attacks and was responsible for a similar string of bomb threats in the Louisville area, including threats to the Islamic Center of Louisville, on Sept. 8 and 2d92ce491b
