We have been investigating the fine specificity of human antibodies and have found that certain antibacterial specificities are preserved in human sera that are derived from infection or immunization with different bacterial antigens. We have also demonstrated the in vivo production of such antisera and have begun to test them in animal models of infection. Finally, we have demonstrated that human antisera can be used for passive immunization to protect mice against gram-negative infections. We now propose to further study the mechanism by which human antibodies are produced and the significance of this mechanism for infection in man. Specifically, we will study the biosynthesis of the specificities in human serum; the cells that produce them; and the role of antigen-specific helper cells in this mechanism. The use of human sera for passive immunization will also be studied in animal models of infection.import { __ } from './i18n'; import LoginFactory from './factory/login-factory'; import LoginModel from './model/login-model'; export default function LoginModule({ logout: logoutFunc } = {})
