Assessment of tissue trauma and inflammatory response in a model of endotracheal tube aspiration in the sheep. Previous studies have shown that endotracheal tube aspiration has potential to cause tissue damage and inflammatory response. The extent of these effects and their relationship to aspiration volume have not been fully evaluated. To assess tissue trauma and inflammatory response in the trachea, tracheal tissue was excised at 30 min following endotracheal tube aspiration (3 ml/kg) or saline control, and tissue sections processed for the evaluation of trauma and inflammation. Endotracheal tube aspiration produced tracheal wall thickening and significantly increased neutrophil infiltration in the mucosa and submucosa. There was no difference in the extent of the neutrophil response between animals aspirated with either saline or 3 ml/kg of air. Results suggest that aspiration volume has no effect on the extent of mucosal and submucosal neutrophil infiltration in the trachea. Further, tracheal wall thickening and mucosal neutrophil infiltration following endotracheal tube aspiration, which are known markers of tissue injury, can be detected at 30 min after endotracheal tube aspiration. The objective of this proposal is to gain new information about the structure and regulation of the following complex problems: a. the metabolic response of mammals to hypoxia. b. the relation between respiration and ATP synthesis. c. the mechanism of regulation of the mitochondrial inner membrane by the glycolytic enzyme phosphofructokinase. d. the mechanism of regulation of phosphofructokinase by the ATP:ADP allosteric enzyme. e. the role of glycolysis in the oxygen sparing effect of lactic acid. The approach is to measure the enzyme activities in vivo and in vitro in liver and mitochondria from a variety of mammals with different respirations and with different genetic backgrounds and to correlate these measurements with the physicochemical properties of the enzymes. The technique of measurement of enzyme activities is the isotope exchange method with simultaneous or sequential specific radioisotope labeling of substrates.
