Tone: Brightness or Saturation Tone describes the brightness or darkness of an image. It is defined as the color of the light reflected back to the camera. Many cameras adjust the white balance to compensate for the ambient light conditions in which the image was captured. This will often leave a lighter or darker shade of gray on the picture because you opened up the color channels differently on a white balance adjustment. As a result, some of the images you capture will be brighter or darker than others. Images are usually brightened or darkened uniformly across the entire image to remove this undesirable variation in tone. The process for removing the unwanted tone is called _brightening_ or _darkening_. This can be a very tedious process when you are removing the tone while maintaining the overall brightness or saturation of the image. The process of brightening or darkening an image is accomplished using the _levels_ feature. Photoshop has an automatic tool that enables you to have Photoshop balance out the _brightness_ or _saturation_ of the image in the darker areas and lighten the brighter areas, preserving some of the original contrast of the image. As you learn how to use Photoshop's levels adjustment tool, you will see that you can

Q: How do I change the font in the Notebook in Emacs? The default font is too big for me. How do I change it in the Notebook in Emacs? A: Type C-x r t to open the Emacs source. Go to C-x r t ffont-lock-default-font, type font-lock-mode, and go to font-lock-variable-name-face. There's a few options, but the important ones are: font-lock-variable-name-face and font-lock-maximum-faces. As the font lock font in Emacs is not the default font, a font-lock-extra-managed-faces variable is set. The first argument is the package name of the font. The second argument is the number of faces which have been bound to this face (e.g. 10 is the default). Change the two variables to your liking. That's about it.

Promoting behaviour change in the care of family members with dementia: a systematic review. The behavioural and psychological symptoms of dementia (BPSD) are a common problem for family members caring for a relative with dementia. Family involvement is increasingly being encouraged for improving quality of care and for promoting positive behaviour change. Behavioural interventions, designed to promote person-centred care are also being used to alleviate BPSD. This systematic review focuses on describing and summarising the evidence for the effectiveness of behavioural interventions for family members of people with dementia. Electronic databases including MEDLINE, PubMed, CINAHL, PsychINFO, EMBASE and the Cochrane Library were searched. Reference lists from relevant articles were also manually searched to identify additional studies. Ten studies were identified. Of these only three were randomised controlled trials. Overall the findings were inconsistent. There was no consistent evidence of benefit of behavioural interventions to reduce depression and/or agitation. There was evidence that goal-orientated caregiving and tele-monitoring were beneficial. Quality of the evidence was assessed as inadequate, because of a lack of randomisation, potential selection bias and very low study power. There is evidence that behavioural interventions may be effective at providing structure to the care and that tele-monitoring may provide important information to the care-giver. There is inadequate evidence for the effectiveness of other interventions. The Spring Release of Bootstrap 2.0 has arrived! What's New in Bootstrap 2.0 Grid
